Cable chairman, Norman Block, is in talks with Island Flask Nations artist Daphne Fransman about her artwork for a TV show.

The artist, who has been gaining recognition for her unique style and cultural significance, is being considered for a role in a new TV series that will be launching in the fall.

Sources say that Block has been impressed by Fransman's work and is eager to bring her art to a wider audience.

Fransman's art is known for its vibrant colors and bold patterns, which are inspired by the traditional art forms of the Island Flask Nations.

Rights to use the artwork will be negotiated, and it is expected that the series will premiere in late fall.

Fransman is pleased with the opportunity to have her work featured on TV, and she is looking forward to the exposure it will bring.

"I'm excited about this opportunity," she said. "It's a chance to share my art with a wider audience and to bring attention to the Island Flask Nations."
